

PATRICIA “PAT” OHL
OCTOBER 2, 1945 — JULY 12, 2012

Pat Ohl was part of the reason Jamestown, New York always put on a first-class, memorable Babe Ruth World Series. For it was through Pat’s efforts and that of her tag-team partner Kathy McMaster who took on the daunting task of securing host families for the World Series hosted by Jamestown, dating back more than three decades. Without fail, the Jamestown women always found a way to hit the ball out of the park.

Pat was low key, she got the job done, and she made everybody feel good when she did it. When everyone else was going crazy, she was one of the voices of reason.

Ohl thrived on sleep deprivation. In the run-up to a World Series, she greeted each player and their host parents, no matter what the hour, only to be back at it early the next morning, making sure that every detail was tended to.

There are thousands of kids who know the name of Pat Ohl, and there are thousands of parents who also know her name. When they remember their time in Jamestown, the first thing they will always remember is Pat Ohl and their Host Family experience, and then they’ll remember the runs, hits and errors.

There was never any player who came through Jamestown that Pat didn’t love and treat as her own.
